And even the very little that does exist is contradictory. One article in a British medical journal said that "diet is implicated in tooth wear." The article cited a study that found that "the diet rich in carbohydrates, which are not digested, stimulates the production of acid by the bacteria in the mouth and affects the teeth." Other studies have shown that higher sugar intake does not increase tooth erosion. Other studies have shown that the more vegetables and fruit you eat, the less likely you are to have your teeth eroded. One study from the University of Iowa found that as people age, their saliva can cause more serious erosion problems, and that the more fruits and vegetables they consume, the less likely they are to develop such problems. Researchers at the University of Toronto noticed a strong correlation between poor dental health and the type of toothbrush used. They found that those who use "whitening" toothbrushes tended to have more dental problems than those who used "whitening" toothpaste. What to do about it: Sometimes tooth brushing can do more harm than good, especially when we are trying to "whiten" the teeth. If you want to whiten the teeth, teeth whiteners are available at most pharmacies and supermarkets. They aren't recommended, though. Not only do they contain mercury, but they also don't do much to really lighten the teeth. And you will pay a lot for them f678ea9f9e
